THE VISIT OF THE ENGLISH UNIVERSITY ZIONISTS

An interesting event in the dull life of our community will be the visit next week of the team of debaters representing the University Zionist element in England. Toronto is one of the few American centers selected by the visitors for displaying their forensic skill.

From press-agent information we gather that the young men who will come here are personages of some importance in the ranks of the younger Jewish intellectuals in England. One of them has, in addition to his own accomplishments, the advantage of being a scion of a distinguished family. The son of Sir Herbert Samuel will surely not be embarrassed if the audience will look at him a second time for the sake of his father.

Toronto's spokesmen will be recruited from the ranks of the local Avukah organization. This comprises the students and recent graduates who are interested in Zionism and are making an attempt to become acquainted with its problems.

Zionism has elements of romanticism and idealism which make their appeal primarily to the youth. Young minds not pinned down by the weight of deadening experience are capable of soaring in the realms of large possibilities. Their view of life is sweeping and comprehensive. And they can follow the lineaments of historic processes. It is to them, therefore, that the grand strokes of the millennial design of the Zionist ideal can be intelligible and significant. In the midst of the practical activities which the present exigencies of Zionism enjoin on its votaries there is need of the youthful element with its fancies and visions.

It is too early yet to tell whether the Avukah movement generally will live up to its possibilities and make the contribution to the economy of Zionism which might be expected of its type of membership. If it will not allow itself to be deflected from the course which it ought to follow it will do a great deal to save Zionism from becoming entirely a money trafficking organization.

It is presumable that the local Jewish community will accord a fitting welcome to our visitors from England. The occasion of their public appearance will have greater significance than that of a mere debate. It will mark the establishment of contacts between our student youth and the intellectual youth of England. It will be profitable to us to meet representatives of the best type of Jewish young manhood in England. And it is to be hoped that their brief stay here will have the effect of stimulating our student and graduate body to take a deeper interest in things intellectual and Jewish.

FORD FEARS FORD

The Sapiro-Ford libel suit is technically a private matter between the plaintiff and the defendant. The former has found himself handicapped in his life work by the published statements of the latter, has suffered financial losses as a result thereof, and is now seeking reparation and a public refutation of the libels.

It is, of course, obvious and notorious that Ford's campaign against Sapiro was merely a part of his general programme of Jew-baiting. Ford focussed his campaign on Sapiro because by vilifying Sapiro he could vilify the whole Jewish race. A mere perusal of the

JEWISH JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

BY RABBI FERDINAND M. ISSERMAN

In the last issue of the CANADIAN JEWISH REVIEW, we referred to the report of the Toronto Juvenile Court of 1926, and pointed out that the Jewish delinquency constituted 15.08 per cent. of the total delinquency, which is twice as much as the Jewish proportion of the population. This week we have on hand an analysis of the charges brought against Jewish children and the disposition of their cases. But even this analysis is unsatisfactory and incomplete. The records were obtained from the court, and unfortunately not many details were available. We find for example that 35.75 per cent. of the Jewish cases were charged with disorderly conduct. Just how severe the offenses in this category were is impossible to determine. It is consequently with an admission of the limitations of the available records that we submit the following:

Of the major offenses, among which are listed theft, housebreaking and shopbreaking, 9.36 per cent. were charged against Jewish children. One out of four Jewish children brought to court was charged with a major offense. The proportion among the general population for this type of offense is greater, four out of ten being charged with major offenses. Half of the Jewish children brought to court were charged with being disorderly or with a breach of the by-law, while 30 per cent. of the children of the rest of the population were so charged. We assume that these offenses were minor ones. In respect to vagrancy, truancy, trespass damage to property and gambling, the proportion of Jewish offenses is about the same as that of others. From these figures therefore, we might make the assumption that even if the percentage of Jewish delinquency is 15 per cent., the percentage of major offences is less than 10 per cent. So much for the analysis of offenses.

Now let us consider the disposition of the cases. Perhaps this may shed some light on the status of our delinquents. We find that in 31.11 per cent. of the Jewish cases, major sentences were pronounced, while that is only true of 26.70 per cent. of the general cases. Four Jewish boys were sent to the industrial school, sixty-four were fined, in fifty-nine cases sentence was suspended. Sixty-two per cent. of the Jewish cases were dismissed or adjourned. In the disposition of Jewish cases we find that 17.57 per cent. received major verdicts. Now these major verdicts do not imply severe penalties. The court is far too humane and far-seeing, but these verdicts mean that the children need watching by the court or some social agency or else were fined. The percentage of Jewish children fined is twice that of others.

Analyse however we will these figures, the facts remain that out of every hundred children brought before the juvenile court last year fifteen were Jewish. That the bulk of the Jewish population is of foreign birth, live in the more congested areas of the city and are economically poorer, account unquestionably for this larger proportion of delinquency. That Jewish offenses appear less severe than others may comfort us. Inescapable, however, is the realization that articles published in Ford's paper will convince any ordinary person that the libels against Sapiro were only an item in the list of libels against the entire people.

Ford's expensive counsel are doing all in their power, by resorting to legal technicalities, to prevent Ford's general scheme of Jew-baiting from entering into this trial. They may succeed in confining the issue and may thus win the trial. But even if Ford wins he will have branded himself as a coward. His anti-Jewish ideas form the major portion of his intellectual baggage. When the occasion presented itself for him to stick by his ideas in open court and let an impartial jury judge them, he slunk away through a legal back-door and refused to defend them. He may win as against Sapiro, but even in that event he will have lost as against the Jewish people as a whole. The tactics of his counsel are tantamount to a repudiation of his ideas which form the background of the Sapiro incident.—A.B.B.

"SLEEPY" HALL RETURNS TO MONTREAL

ONCE AGAIN MONTREALERS WILL HAVE THE PLEASURE OF DANCING TO THE STRAINS OF A CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA, ONE THAT IS INTERNATIONALLY FAMOUS, AND WHICH PLAYED BEFORE PRESIDENT DOUMERGUE IN PARIS. "SLEEPY" HALL AND HIS TEN-PIECE RHYTHM ORCHESTRA ARE NOW PLAYING NIGHTLY FOR THE SUPPER DANCES AT THE VENETIAN GARDENS, SO "CHEZ VENETIAN" WILL BE THE PASSWORD WITH THE DANCE-LOVING PUBLIC FOR THE NEXT FEW WEEKS AT LEAST. THE VENETIAN HAS JUST RECENTLY HAD A COMPLETE CHANGE IN OWNERSHIP AND PERSONNEL, ITS CONTROL HAVING PASSED FROM OTTAWA PARTIES TO A GROUP OF WELL-KNOWN MONTREALERS WHO INTEND TO MAINTAIN AN EVEN HIGHER STANDARD THAN IN THE PAST, AND AS AN EVIDENCE OF THIS POLICY HAVE INDUCED "SLEEPY" HALL AND HIS ORCHESTRA, THE MOST POPULAR ORCHESTRA IN MONTREAL IN THE LAST FIVE YEARS, TO RETURN FOR A LIMITED ENGAGEMENT.

There is a hopeful omen in the fact that Soviet Russia, which has been doing so nobly in the colonization of Jews, is importing tropical fruits—raised by colonists—from Palestine. The first shipment of oranges, 7,500 cases, is now on the way to Russia.

EDUCATIONAL WORK IN PALESTINE

From the report issued by the Educational Department of the Palestine Zionist Executive for the last year, it appears that in spite of the difficult economic conditions, the work of education has been considerably enlarged and the number of schools increased. Five educational institutions passed from the supervision of the department for economic or other reasons, but thirty were added, showing a net increase of twenty-five for the year. These institutions will bring eighty-eight additional teachers, eighty-three classes and 2,350 pupils under the control of the department. The increase in the number of pupils was mostly in the towns and especially in Tel-Aviv.

Jacob's Protege

By ESTER CARMEL

Jacob Neumann climbed up the stairs which led to the flat wherein he rented a bedroom. It was a top flat, and the room was cheap.

As Jacob closed the door of the flat behind him and turned along the passage, he noticed a cloud of tobacco smoke issuing through the half-open door of the room next to his, and realized that Tibor Ketony was in.

A voice called to him: "Is that you, Neumann?" But Jacob made no reply, as he entered his room. He did not want the youth's company. He needed a few minutes' peace and solitude to think over and digest the news he had just received; needed to be able to realize this last blow of misfortune, so that he could try and form plans for the future. Without removing either his hat or overcoat, he flung himself into an arm-chair, rested his chin on his hands, and thought and thought. . .

It was several years previously when Neumann had drifted into Budapest, a refugee from Poland. The distant relative whose influence he had hoped would obtain him a post had died a few days before his arrival. He had been a wealthy Jewish banker, but his descendants had forsaken Judaism, and gave Jacob clearly to understand that his acquaintance was not wanted.

For many months Jacob had suffered privation and want, just picking up enough casual employment to keep himself alive, until by the merest chance he had obtained work in a chemical factory, where his scientific knowledge had been of considerable use. It was not long before his ability attracted attention, and when the old man who was in charge of the experimental station died, Jacob was given his place.

In this new position he came much into contact with the managing director, his immediate chief, a little foxy-looking man with alert, suspicious eyes. Jacob was convinced that the man was a Jew, though he boasted an historical Hungarian name, and never missed an opportunity of proclaiming his Magyar sympathies.

One day Jacob was in the chief's private office. The managing director, it seemed, had something on his mind. He glanced about in a suspicious manner, though there was little fear of intrusion, then spoke in a lowered tone. "You are a Jew, Neumann, I know. Take a word of advice, and don't tell other people about it."

For a moment Jacob looked at him blankly, then he felt a twinge of amusement. "Why, anyone can see I'm a Jew," he protested. "And anyway, I told the works manager when he asked me one day. I don't see why I should want to hide it."

The managing director meditatively gnawed his underlip. "Perhaps not," he said; then more abruptly: "Don't imagine I believe in any of this anti-Semitic nonsense, but you know how things are, Neumann. It didn't so much matter when you were just one of the hundreds of workers here. Then you passed unnoticed. But now it is different. As head of a department . . ." His voice trailed off, and he was silent for a moment. "I am only speaking for your own good, Neumann, to avoid trouble. And, anyhow, it isn't as though you even went to synagogue on—er—I mean, it's not as if you were particularly religious."

The little man flushed uncomfortably. He picked up a pen from his desk and made one or two nervous jabs on the blotting pad before him.

Fascinated by he knew not what, Neumann watched the little dots blacken and grow as the ink spread. It seemed Herbert Fordham, a New York lawyer, is leader of a movement among state law associations to raise the educational requirements for admission to the bar of New York State. At a gathering of lawyers before the Court of Appeals this month he presented the plea that higher requirements be asked in order to prevent ignorant law students from becoming lawyers eligible to practice in the courts. Speaking for a joint committee he asked that two years' study in a college or the equivalent and a three years' course in a law school replace the present requirement of four years in high school. In the course of his address Fordham paid his compliments to Jewish applicants and members of the bar and so the Yiddish press is on his neck with the old cry of anti-Semitism.

Jacob Fishman in the Jewish Morning Journal rebukes Fordham for "injecting a Jewish issue into the discussion" by his assertions regarding Jewish law students and lawyers. The Jewish Day says emphatically that "the movement to raise the requirements for bar admission does not represent a desire to elevate and dignify the profession but a manoeuvre against the growing number of Jewish lawyers in New York. The effort in the direction of higher standards supposedly for the whole legal profession appears as the old, ugly and un-American effort to restrict the Jews." The Jewish Daily News takes the stand that the whole thing is a question of agitation against Jewish laywers. Hillel Rogoff in the Forward says that throughout the whole history of the United States the law profession has been on a low level and that it always was a mere means of making money and attaining political success. He quotes Daniel Webster, who lived in the real Yankee atmosphere of New England, as saying that "I fear the law profession will stifle in me the sense of mercy and dull my feelings." Rogoff claims that if the profession has attained a higher level this has been in recent years in the eastern states where most of the Jewish and immigrant lawyers are to be found.

Fordham, who resigned from the Committee on Character and Fitness of Applicants for Admission to the Bar after serving a month because he felt he was "wasting his time," said that he made a study of fitness of applicants and had found the majority insufficiently educated. He said: "A much larger part of the Jewish population desires to enter the law than of any other racial division of the population." Recently a prominent, intelligent and well-informed Jewish lawyer, long a resident of Brooklyn, said that at no distant date 90 per cent. of the Brooklyn bar would be Jewish. Also, although there is an occasional Jewish applicant of brilliant mind and good education, most of the Jewish applicants come from ignorant families utterly lacking an American background, and within the limitations of the actual work done in the public schools seem unable to acquire sufficient real education and knowledge prior to entering the law schools. These facts are not to be understood to lead to the conclusion that I am or that any one ought to be opposed to Jews or to the ambition of Jewish boys to enter the bar. On the contrary, my own view is that the Jewish boys should be paid the very high compliment of being treated precisely the same as all other American boys without regard to race, religion or place of origin.

"However, the fact as existing and certain arguments occasionally advanced do not indicate the possibility of efforts to pass over deficiencies in training when present in so large an element among the voters. Also it has been suggested by a Jewish lawyer that many of these boys are going into law for the reason that it now is the easiest and cheapest profession that they can enter. They seek to enter at an early age, from 21 to 25. They are younger than many applicants who come from long-established American families with a background of generations of life under the English common law. My experience in the year 1926 on the committee on character and fitness convinced me that very few of all the applicants during the year were learned young men or qualified at the time of appearance before the committee to be admitted to a learned profession."

Before getting their dander up Jews would do well to examine dispassionately what Fordham said. Is he right? Are his statements true? The Jewish predilection for the bar is well-known in Canada and the States. The statement was made recently in Toronto by a careful observer that nearly every Jewish family, counting family connection, has a lawyer in it. Competition must be keen. Perhaps some day before very long Jewish boys about to work toward the profession will have to get together and draw lots or shoot craps to decide who is going to be a lawyer. A reading of Fordham's whole address must seem to the unbiased an expression from an honest, forthright man, one who is not anti-Semitic. He was inadvertently done the Jews a good turn by calling to public attention that their preference for law is so marked it is becoming disastrous to them.

to him that deep shadows were blotting out a fair horizon.

But Jacob's heart was stubborn in its loyalty.

It was true that he had gradually drifted away from religious observance—his employment had demanded it—but it was a very different matter when it came actually to denying his own people. A stubborn reaction set in. Secretly, he despised the pompous little man for his advice, but he curbed his desire rashly to speak his mind. Back in Poland were his parents and some younger brothers and sisters who looked to Jacob for support. Responsibility such as this, coupled with the bitter experiences he had gone through when first he came to Hungary, had done much to moderate the hot temper of youth.

The managing director dropped his pen, and softly rubbed his hands together. "Well, I thought I'd just mention it, Neumann. You see, in case of any trouble of that kind, I'm quite powerless. There's the president of the directorium, Count Genky—between you and me, something of a bigot—but still ... Yes, I should be quite powerless."

The managing director smiled Jacob out of the office, feeling in a not unkindly heart that he had probably done a fellow Jew a good turn, hoping at the same time that his words would bear fruit, that Jacob would take the hint, and forsake Judaism, and so avoid any unpleasantness arising from jealousy which Neumann's unusual success might otherwise arouse among the less fortunate members of the staff.

In two minutes the managing director had dismissed the conversation from his mind. Jacob was not so fortunate. He felt degraded and angry at having been forced, as it were, to see a clear issue where before he might not have troubled his head. He had been drifting, but now his feet were suddenly stayed.

From home the letters told one long, unbroken story of misery and struggle, no money to be earned, if it wasn't for Jacob they would all be starving. And Jacob wondered if old Rabbi Neumann, his father, had the least suspicion that he was living on money secured by the denial of his ancient faith and race. For, that his lack of religious observance would terribly shock his father, Jacob well knew. But what could he do?

And, as one problem can to a certain extent dull the poignancy of another, Jacob's religious trouble was overshadowed by a constant dread of deportation. The managing director's words had only increased that fear. What would the old people do if he were cast out to find what livelihood he could in some other land!

Then, one night, in a cheap cafe he had met young Tibor Kerony, the survivor of an aristocratic Hungarian house that had fallen on evil times, and then decayed. Degeneracy might have been too hard a word to apply to young Kerony, but there was no denying that the lad was weak, ineffectual, utterly lacking in stamina.

And Jacob was suffering, literally suffering, from lack of companionship. He could not choose his friends haphazardly. Such friends of his own type of intellect that he might have had were nearly all deep in political scheming of one sort or another. And Jacob knew the folly of friendship with such people.

When he first met Tibor, the youth was down and out, penniless and starving, and yet so very different from the usual anvils fashioned by suffering to take Fate's unkindly blows. Tibor could not "take" them. He was so utterly helpless, and had learned nothing from misfortune. He was of the type who never could learn.

Jacob guessed him to be about eighteen years old. His face was almost effeminately pretty. Jacob did not recognize the peevish spirit which his mouth clearly indicated, nor yet the capriciously wilful egoism suggested by the high nostrils. Learning that the youth had had some kind of a scientific course at a university, though this, like every other enterprise in Tibor's short life, had not been finished, Neumann contrived somehow to get him a post in his department at the works. Tibor had moaned ineffectually that nowhere could he find a hole to sleep in at a price he could afford. And Jacob had secured a room for him at the flat of old Frau Hilgers, where Jacob himself lodged.

But, as soon as Tibor had felt himself safe and apparently secure from destitution, he had begun to be a constant source of trouble to his benefactor. He grumbled incessantly. He had to get to work too early. He could not live on his wages. Why couldn't Jacob lend him the money for some clothes. Jacob must be getting a big salary. And Jacob had lent him the money.

But Tibor's demands increased. He seemed incapable of facing life's responsibilities and in despair, one evening, after they had been living together for nearly a year, Jacob had told him whence he had come, and how he was obliged to keep his parents and family in Poland. Tibor had been deeply impressed. He had declared he would rather walk the streets in rags than ask more money of Jacob.

And Jacob was happy in the thought that his pity for Tibor had not been misplaced. Despite all his faults, the youth's heart was in the right place, and as Tibor said "Good-night" that evening, Jacob was thankful indeed for having at least one friend in the land.

But Tibor's vacillating character did not long retain good sentiments. True, he did not renew his requests for money, but he was always bothering Jacob to get him a rise in salary. At last, Jacob told him plainly that it was beyond his power. Tibor sulked for a week, refused to talk to his friend, and went off with a crowd of former student companions, wasters like himself.

So the friendship varied. For two or three days the two would be on the best of terms, then Tibor would fly into a rage at something or other, and go off on his own.

And now Jacob sat in the arm-chair in his room without having removed either hat or coat. The dreaded blow had fallen. Jacob, the head of a department, had not forsworn his race. He had been discovered. He had to go. He had ignored Kerony's about of, "Is that you, Neumann?" as he came into the flat. His goodwill towards Tibor Kerony was dead, slain by that one word—deported! Jacob's mind ran feverishly over the past year, and the more he thought the more certain he was who had betrayed him.

His landlady came into the room, and exclaimed when she saw him sitting there in his hat and overcoat, "Was he ill, the good Herr Neumann?"

Jacob looked at her with a melancholy smile. "I've got to go," he said, simply.

"Go!" she echoed in amazement, "Go where?"

"Away altogether, out of Hungary. God knows where!"

"But, but what have you done?"

"Done," Jacob smiled wearily. "I have been born in Poland instead of Hungary, and, in addition, have had the folly to be born a Jew."

The old woman, a devout Catholic, was clamorous in her distress. She blamed this thing and that, and bemoaned the fact that the Government took so little heed of the Holy Catholic Church. Had not the Bishop himself denounced these secret Magyar societies and their nonsense about a Jewish menace?

Jacob began to pack his things, and the old woman shambled off to her kitchen. But in a few moments she was back again with a broken crucifix. "Herr Neumann," she said, "you are so clever with your fingers, you can always mend things as though they had never been broken. See here..." She held out the crucifix, from which the figure of Jesus had been broken. "Please—before you go."

Jacob stopped packing and took the thing gently from her fingers. He examined it to see how it had been fixed before, and, without a word, set to work to mend it again. He cut down and sharpened two match-stalks with which to refix the effigy to the cross, while the old woman kept up a mumbling chatter that alternated between Jacob's misfortune and the history of Jesus.

A slight noise roused Jacob from his task. He looked up sharply and beheld the youth Tibor leaning against the frame-work of the door, pale of face, his hair in disorder, and tear-stains beneath his eyes. For a moment Jacob looked at him steadily, then, without a word, he resumed his task.

There was silence, broken only by an occasional convulsive sob from Tibor.

At last the effigy was secure. But the old woman was not quite happy. There was the small pedestal to be fixed at the bottom. "Won't you put that back as well?" she asked, "to make his poor feet more comfortable."

Tibor came into the room, and thrust the old woman aside. "Jacob, I've something terrible to tell you. It was I who gave you away. I don't know why—."

"I knew that already," said Jacob, without turning his head.

Tibor flushed dull red, then the colour drained away, and left his former pallor. "It's horrible," he groaned. "You don't know what I'm suffering." Then recrimination set in. "What do you care how I suffer. You don't know the terrors of remorse. You don't care if I kill myself, Jacob! For heaven's sake, say something. Don't you see..." Don't you understand? It's terrible after all you've done for me to have betrayed you, ruined you—and your people! My God!" Sobbing violently, he flung himself face downwards on Jacob's bed beside the half-filled suit case.

The old woman pattered out of the room with her mended crucifix, and Jacob resumed his packing. "Why," burst out Kerony, "did you save me from starvation to bring me to this? Because you are a Jew. Why are you sober and clever and able to give things to the world? Because you are a Jew. Do you wonder that I hated you, hated you till I had to betray you? And now that I could tear my own flesh with remorse, what do you care? You shrug your shoulders. You mend that ugly old crone's crucifix—you, a Jew!—while I eat out my heart with misery through you."

Jacob closed his bag with a sharp click, gave a last look round the room, scarcely noticing the boy on the bed and walked out of the flat.

As he set off towards the railway station the picture rose suddenly in his mind of himself mending the old woman's crucifix. He smiled half bitterly, half whimsically, then, shrugging his shoulders, said to himself:

"Na! He also was a Jew!"—Michigan Tribune.

The Little Hebraists

By M. FRANK

Little Moshe is six years old. He is short and stubby and full of vim. He has a pretty cherub face with a very clever expression. He has a rare combination of brown eyes with golden curls. "Taltalei-Zohov" (Goldilocks) the children exclaim whenever Moshe's head happens to be bared.

Moshe is a little Hebraist. He speaks Hebrew, he loves Hebrew, he experiences some of the most thrilling moments of his little young life in Hebrew. Every day his soul is being enriched by some new concept, some new emotion which come to him in the Hebrew language. Some day in the future Moshe will look back with a feeling of sweet, painful longing upon the days when he was in my class and revelled in a wealth of colourful impressions in Hebrew.

If you think I am exaggerating, come into my class and watch Moshe's face when I tell the class a story. It is nice to watch Moshe when his brain is at work. He wrinkles his little brow, his large brown Jewish eyes lose some of their usual lustre and seem to be looking at me and yet far away. Moshe is working hard to place himself in those new vistas which are being opened for his tender and vigorous little mind when he hears long and fascinating tales about distant lands and about the distant past.

Now watch Moshe rise to comment. I have to interrupt my story for a while and listen to what Moshe has to say. And say it he must; there is no stopping him. Moshe is not a little soldier whose business it is merely to listen and obey. Moshe needs to unfold his personality by giving expression to his mental experiences. Moshe wants to know what Joseph did when his brothers threw him into the pit, or, something in the story strangely reminds Moshe of the little kittens at his house. Or, he wishes to express his condemnation of Laban. When something in the story strikes Moshe as being funny, he gives a rippling laugh and remarks, "Ze matzchik" (this makes one laugh), but when he has something difficult to express he struggles hard with Hebrew, stands there near his seat, picking with his little finger at his little pug nose, hemming and hawing. The children laugh and mock him: "Eh—eh- eh," but Moshe won't let up. He persists until he has expressed his thought in Hebrew. There is a true Hebraist for you.

Now watch little Moshe when he hears of Isaac being mounted on the altar by his father or of Joseph being thrown into the pit or of Mordecai rending his clothes when the evil decree is published. What a painful expression on his face! Lines form themselves around the mouth and on the forehead, the chin is wrinkled, the little cherub mouth is shrivelled up and the eyes become so sombre, they are all but filled with tears. You can almost see his heart write with pain. This is Moshe's first knowledge of the difficult problems of human life. Here is the soul in the making.

Last year Moshe was in the Kindergarten, which enjoyed the direction of a capable and devoted teacher. Unfortunately, due to the novelty of the idea of a Hebrew kindergarten, the attendance was not large, so that by the end of the year only about ten children were left who could go on with their Hebrew past the Kindergarten. These ten children are a class by themselves, yet the school could not afford to have a class of ten. So we joined them with twenty young children who had received their elements of Hebrew in the regular classes for beginners and who were bright enough to have mastered the language well enough to make them a match to the Kindergarten children. This created a difficult situation as it meant two sections in the same class, since Moshe and his little friends could neither write nor read Hebrew while "the Seniors" could read and write with fair fluency. There are two ways of preventing such a situation: one is to have no Kindergarten at all, the other is to have a large Kindergarten.

Gittele and Rochele (Gertie and Ruthie, if you please) are twins, six years old. They are the quietest, prettiest, healthiest, neatest twins you ever saw. Their quietness is misleading. Even their father thought they did not understand any Hebrew. But the other day they saw a Purim comedy in Hebrew staged by pupils more than twice their age. "Did Ahasuerus know he was a fool?" I asked them in Hebrew. "No," they answered (in Hebrew, of course), "he said, 'I am a wise king.'" Gittele and Rochele do not enjoy so much listening to the teacher's long stories (don't forget for a moment, the stories are all in Hebrew), nor do they enjoy telling their own stories—they are too shy for that. What they do like most is picking up a primer and deciphering a story for themselves with the little ability to read they have recently acquired. And of late they exhibit a surprising interest in grammatical exercises.

Leah is so blonde she would have no trouble entering the United States. Her large blue eyes express infinite goodness of heart and just as infinite readiness for mischief. She is constitutionally unable to walk, she must run or jump. It is really more like flying, or sailing. She spreads out her arms and—she is in quick motion; such is her method of perambulation. If I do not manage to place myself in front of her the whole class runs instead of marching quietly. For Leah is always at the head, she is a born leader. Last year, in the Kindergarten, Leah had a better opportunity of exercising her qualities of leadership. She used to lead in building Pharaoh's palace or in initiating games. The transition from the Kindergarten to a class is somewhat difficult for an active and restless child like Leah. In spite of the comparative freedom and lack of restraint in the class, Leah is not as much in her element as she used to be in the Kindergarten. She is a vivid illustration of the artificiality of school desks. Leah is at her best when an illustration is required. If the teacher says "koton" (small) Leah is working with her head and fingers to help you get the idea of smallness. As soon as she hears "godol" (large) she is all but stretching to the ceiling, with her eyes wide open, and saying in her raw voice: "Kmo zeh, mar Frank, kmo zeh" (Like this, Mr. Frank, like this).

Of the "ex-Kindergarten" section, Naftoli is the best most devoted and most conscious Jew and Hebraist. No joy would be like his, should his father and mother speak to him in Hebrew. Nothing comforts him better when abed with a little cold than a Hebrew storybook. He is more mentally mature than the rest of his little friends, being slightly older. Naftoli or Norman is already past seven and, with respect to his mental development, belongs more properly to the Senior group. He is a tall, frail boy with a fine intelligent face and deep-set blue eyes. Naftoli is the most vociferous of my pupils in expressing his appreciation of the fine Hebrew stories he learns in my class. He is also the most capable of formulating his attitude towards Judaism and the Hebrew language. I wonder how much his grandfather has to do with it. Naftoli is great friends with his grandfather with whom he converses exclusively in Hebrew. What Naftoli expresses so well all his little friends feel. They will some day know better than their fathers and mothers how to translate sentiments into actual living.

"—the plot thickens"

From now on at this time of year we see some queer odds and ends come into this laundry to be washed. Ever since we more or less challenged the women of Toronto to send us odd things to wash, they have taken us at our word and have certainly sent some that were, to say the least, unexpected. Housecleaning time is just about here, and we are quite prepared for the usual batch of unusual things like rag carpets, curtains, silence cloths, etc. We have even washed boat sails. So don't be afraid to include such things in your bundle. If in doubt, phone

MAIL BOX

March 29, 1927.

Editor,
Canadian Jewish Review.

We are daily receiving complaints of miscellaneous collections for so-called deserving poor families.

While the Federation, through its Family Welfare Bureau, endeavours to meet all worthy calls, it cannot do so without the assistance of every member of the community.

As long as the public encourages the giving of promiscuous charity to every alms collector that comes to his home or office with or without credentials, for causes of which he knows nothing, just so long will constructive philanthropy as practised by Federation be unable to fulfill its obligations to its subscribers and to the poor.

The remedy lies with the individual donor. Let him report to the Federation office every call made upon him, with possibly the name of the person soliciting, and above all the name and address of the family in need, and a full report will be made to him. During January, February and March, Federation expended over $13,000 for relief purposes.

It is only through a conscientious refusal to encourage private collections for families or appeals for doubtful causes that we can hope for better organized philanthropy.

Sincerely yours,
JOSEPH A. WOOLF,
Executive Director.

Carmel Myers in a beautiful blonde wig, and Joan Crawford, dark, handsome and more radiant than ever, are the two "fair ones" who share the Klieg in Metro's latest film opus, "The Understanding Heart." This is a highly sensational production which will be offered at Loew's Theatre commencing next Monday, April 4. The story concerns Monica Dale, daughter of a forest ranger. Joan Crawford makes a definite bid for stardom as Monica. A stunning beauty, who apparently has brains, Miss Crawford should go far. Francis X. Bushman, Jr., is seen in the part of Tony, the young forest ranger. Five big vaudeville acts are offered, featuring Kimberly and Page in "The Heart Broker."

SOVIET VICE-PRESIDENT DISCUSSES JEWISH COLONIZATION

A conference of agricultural experts was recently convened in Moscow by the Russian Government Commission for Jewish Colonization (Comzet). The principal address was delivered by Mr. Smidowitch, vice-president of the Soviet Union and of the Comzet. He pointed out that the settlement of Jews on the land was part of the Government policy of reconstruction. While the Government was anxious to see collective farming developed, it does not press this, realizing that the Jews who have recently taken to farming came from different strata of society, so that collective farming must for the present remain as a desirable theory. Large tracts of land were allocated by the Government in Crimea, Ukraine and Central Russia and about 10,000 Jewish families have already been settled during the past two years. The goal, however, is to settle 100,000 Jewish families on the soil, and it is for this reason that the Conference of Jewish agricultural experts was convened, so that they may work out plans for the creation of a Jewish peasantry, which shall be able to conserve its national peculiarities while devoting its forces to the development of their agricultural lives.

Mr. Smidowitch further announced that the full franchise has now been granted to all Jewish settlers and that Jewish village soviets will soon be established. He stressed the point that education will be one of the chief concerns of the Comzet in the Jewish colonies, feeling that the Jews will not allow themselves to sink into illiteracy. He also hinted at the possibility of finding one compact territory where it should be possible to form a Jewish autonomous unit.

In connection with this it is of interest to note that only last week a report from Moscow declared that the Government authorities have decided to organize a Jewish administrative district in the province of Cherson, in the region in which the old Jewish colonies are situated. It is estimated that Jews in that district form 87 per cent. of the entire population. The oldest Jewish colony there is more than a hundred years old and this will probably be the centre of the new district. The authorities are pressing the matter of organization and it is not unlikely that a district conference will be held in the very near future for the purpose of organizing the administrative work so that the movement may be launched at an early date.

ECONOMIC CONDITION OF POLISH JEWS

For some time negotiations have been proceeding between representatives of the Jewish Club and the Government regarding a law that was passed by the Seim, taking away certain concessions in the tobacco industry from Jews and giving it to Polish soldiers injured in the war. The bill has not as yet gone into effect, pending these negotiations, but recently the Government authorities interrupted the negotiations, apparently wishing the provisions of the bill to go into effect automatically. It is estimated that 35,000 Jews will be affected by this measure, since it involves also several other industries in which Jews are engaged. The Jewish deputies who carried on the negotiations feel very much hurt at the manner in which the Minister of Finance and the Director of Monopolies have terminated these negotiations and it is feared that the measure will now go into effect, causing misery and starvation to many Jewish families.

Although the Government has not acceded to the various Jewish demands, the Jewish deputies decided to oppose all votes of no-confidence in the present Government, because they realize the danger to Jews of a combination of the Right and Centre Parties, which are avowedly anti-Semitic.

The ashes of Dr. Henry W. Frauenthal, surgeon and philanthropist, who died in a fall from a seventh floor window at his home, No. 18 West 70th Street, will rest in a vault in the Hospital for Joint Diseases, which Dr. Frauenthal founded and developed. On October 4, 1955, "this being the fiftieth anniversary of the incorporation of said hospital," they shall be removed from their resting place and "be scattered from the roof of said hospital to the four winds," says his will.

Rabbi Isserman's Editorial

s members of the Jewish group, we must concern ourselves to minimize this delinquency. As Jews anxious to hold high the Jewish name and anxious to help our immigrants and their children adjust themselves, we must face more and more the additional burdens and responsibilities. We are indeed our brother's keepers. The sins of a few Jews are charged against the entire community and what we can do to minimize these sins we must.

But even more important than upholding the Jewish name is the task of saving the Jewish immigrant child from the difficulties of the adjustment period. We who have adjusted ourselves, who remember our own immigrant days or those of our parents, must give to the new arrivals all the opportunities we have had and more to develop those fine moral traits which are our heritage. We hope that next year, through our social agencies, we shall know the full history of every Jewish case brought before the Juvenile Court. We hope also that by the establishment of more religious schools and more boys' clubs, etc., we shall bring to bear on our children those influences which will mould character and which will tend to reduce our record in the Juvenile Court. We owe that to the children, to the name of our people and to Canada.

GIFTS TO LIBRARY FROM WARSAW

The friends of the University in Warsaw have forwarded to the Library in Jerusalem a consignment of ten cases of books. Among the various items included is the collection of the physician, Dr. Wincenty Glass, who died in Iyar 5866 in Tomaszow, bequeathing his entire collection to the Library. The deceased was a great lover of books, and his collection is not confined to medicine alone, but extends to various other branches as well.

Together with this gift came a collection of belles lettres and books on medical science, presented by Dr. Bernard Joz, of Warsaw, a past benefactor of the Library.

Mr. Stawski, chairman of the organization, presented to the library as a memorial to his wife, the catalogue of the Paris National Library, a collection of eighty-eight volumes, and has, in addition, sent a considerable number of Russian periodicals.

The organization in Warsaw, also, has obtained from the local "Kulturliga" all the publications which this publishing house issues.
